OUR DUNKIRK CORRESPONDENCE.

DUNKINK, May 16, 1851. The first banner in the procession was one from the Waverley ladies, bearing the inscription "Westward ho!" It was of the finest satin, beautifully ernamented, and the staff was wreathed with the most exquisite artificial flowers.

At Elmira, Mr. Devys, formerly a director of the read, made the following speech in receiving the President, his cabinet, and the directors of the Eric Railroad:—

I welcome, I greet you in the name of Elmira. Though we have long since learned to appreciate the importance of this read, we are received to appreciate the importance of this read, we are received the property first evidence of its vast advantages, and if this glorious day. He who would tell how much a tistery of the difficulties that have been a back. I will not, therefore, occupy your time in relating these matters, though I desire to do you instite. This is no novel enterprise. A far-seeing mind long since one-reived the idea. In 1821 it was homely the property of the idea of the property of the interprise. The and never for a monact should be sufficiently as a sum, the railroad would be brail the day nor perhaps for many years to come. A draft of yours was never dishonored, even them those animals the bulls and hears in wall street were slaming the money interest. When there was not a dollar in the treasurer's hands, and these gentiementated to come to him with demure faces, that seemed to say all was lost, both your treasurer and your presidentanced to meet them with as kearty a laugh as Napoleon gave before a victory. This disarmed their suspicious were unfounded. Thus the enterprise went on prespering, till now at length it is accomplished, and everything looks bright and cheering. But there is better cheer for you gentlemen. Hut her you, what would was how o fresh shad and living lobstors? (Roars of laughter.) What is better than all, you have brought us to-day live President. (Renewed laughter.) Who, a lattle while ago, would have expected such an honor for this while go, would have every think of the work of the first cannon carry to the first and only the property of the work of the three of the case of the lattle of education and improvement in these cann on one condition, namely, if Marcy would promise to reciprocate the honor should he be elected President.

Stages were passing in and out, loaded with the agricultural population from the surrounding contry, several of them being drunk and fighting. Stages were passing in and out, loaded with the distance and the will agree themselves with exilt ement. They crowded to the wharves to look at the teamboats, and opened their eyes in amazement, never having seen a steamboat in their lives be by President Fillmore and the cabinet, and proceeded to the depot, where refreshments were laid out, and, after marching around it, entered at the cast side. All were much interested at the grand display which met their attonished vision. The barbecued oxen suspended from poles, the roasted sheep resting leisurely on immense dishes, the ton feet loaves of bread, the bath-tubs of pork and beans, and other edibles were examined, and were descanted upon freely. Mr. Fillmore was struck particularly with the pork and beans, and would, no doubt, have been pleased to taste them had the crowd permitted him to do. Mr. Webster imposiced the chowder, but did not taste it. He told is cretary Crittenden, however, that it looked about and he had no doubt it was properly compounded. He said it was a dish of which he was particularly fond, and when he had the pleasure of meeting him at Marshfield, he would invite him to eat some of his own making. He had the reputation, he said, of making it well, and, if report speaks true, he does make it well. A little port wine, he informed Mr. Crittenden, was a greet improvement in chowder, and if Mr. C. should ever under ake to make a "mess" of it, he recommended him, by all means, to nut a pint of good old port into it. Any one who has eaten chowder with this addition would be as partial to that beautiful dish as he was himself Mr. Crittenden said he would take the advice of his dictinguabed associate in the cabinet.

After impecting the depot theroughly, the procession was reformed, and proceeded to the Loder House, where tables were spread for the guests. After taking their seats, each person washed down the dust which had accumulated in his threat with a glass of — water, and then they paid their respects to the substantials. After justice was done to the dimer, the health of Lieutenant Governor Patterson was proposed.

Lieutenant Governor Patterson replied:—
